This fall, the Wisconsin Legislature is likely to consider a cost containment initiative to curb the high and rising cost of medical treatment for injured workers. Medical providers are pressuring lawmakers to reject the measure. As a Wisconsin employer, this single issue will have a greater impact on your worker's compensation costs than any proposed legislation in recent memory. Your support for medical cost containment is crucial.

According to the Worker's Compensation Research Institute (WCRI):

- Wisconsin had the highest average per-claim medical payments from 2014-2015.
- Prices for non-hospital services and hospital outpatient services were highest in Wisconsin, compared to 27 other states in the same study.
- Wisconsin employers pay more than double the typical price for common services, like pain management injections, radiology services and even basic evaluation and management.
- Prices for worker's compensation medical treatment grew faster than any other study state from 2009-2014.

Every two years, the state of Oregon ranks all 50 states and the District of Columbia on the overall rate for worker's compensation costs. In 2014 Wisconsin was 23rd, and in 2016 rose to the 12th most expensive state for worker's compensation.
